As educational reforms intensify in Western countries, there is a growing interest in Chinese education due to Chinese students’ academic performance, particularly in Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics (STEM). However, the research literature on Chinese education remains limited and outdated, and few Chinese education scholars publish in English. Since Chinese education theories and practices are rooted in Confucianism, a systematic examination of its influence on Chinese education and its relevance to education in Western countries is both important and timely.

Dates: Friday, October 17—Sunday, October 19
Place: Ramada Hotel and Conference Center, Amherst, NY
Cost: $100 per participant (for conference materials, opening reception, lunch, coffee breaks)
Organized by the School of Education and sponsored by the UB Confucius Institute.

For more information, visit the conference website: http://gse.buffalo.edu/confucius

Since Buddhist Studies research on women has almost entirely focused on nuns, it has neglected the majority of female Buddhist professionals in contemporary Japan who are ordained priests and temple abbots. Unlike the sons who are born into temples and raised to run them, these women are entering a world that largely does not want them, often resents their presence and may not fully recognize them legally. Their stories force us to reconsider our assumptions of how contemporary Japanese Buddhism is lived, negotiated, taught and propagated.

Presenter: Mark Rowe, Associate Professor of Religious Studies, McMaster University
